Makaira Resort on Taveuni turns Reef Restoration into a Fine Art

When Hawaii native Roberta Davis first came to Taveuni in 1986 she never could have dreamed she'd be on the leading edge of reef restoration.

For her, discovering Taveuni was all about scuba.

An experienced diver, she had never seen anything as pristine as Fiji's reef life — except in books.

She liked Taveuni so much, she (and her husband John Llanes, also a Hawaii native) opened a small resort called Makaira. Roberta runs the day-to-day operations (and takes visitors snorkeling) while John takes guests deep-sea fishing aboard his 35' boat.

As in any small business, Makaira had its challenges, but nothing compared to Cyclone Tomas, a Category 4 storm that ravaged the Fiji archipelago on March 9, 2010.

Makaira, located in Taveuni near Matei, has three bungalows. The property has weathered a number of cyclones.

"Our three bungalows were damaged, and the normally calm cove in front of our property was hammered by 15- to 20-foot waves. It crushed our corals," she said. She was devastated by the destruction of the reef, which had been a "huge tourist attraction."

While they were busy fixing up the property, a friend from California, Scott Putnam, arrived and told Roberta that she could "fix the reef" by planting coral. "Just pick up a fragment or broken coral," Scott

Nobody in Fiji was doing coral gardening at the time, and she gave it a try.

Her friend was right. She discovered that 90% of the coral fragments she replanted grew back.

Her friend was right. She discovered that 90% of the coral fragments she replanted grew back.

Roberta is heartened that other properties, including the Outrigger Fiji Resort (managed by Honolulu- based Outrigger Hotels and Resorts), also engage their guests in coral planting.

In the meantime she consulted with the Fijian government about turning her reef into a marine conservation zone. She's still waiting for the government to approve her marine reserve, and she's confident that it will happen.

"The Fiji government understands that people get their livelihood from healthy reefs and that visitors travel from around the world to see them," she said. "I've had tourists tell me that our inshore reef is the most beautiful that they've ever experienced."

Roberta sighed, "We hope to keep it that way."

FIJI TOURISM - When surfers talk about Fiji, they're often too preoccupied with Cloudbreak and her little sister Restaurants to consider the islands' other offerings. While there's no denying that Cloudbreak is Fiji's premiere wave, there's a bunch of less crowded, endlessly fun waves littered around the islands. To explore and highlight Fiji's lesser known fruits, we took Sage Erickson, Macy Callaghan, Laura Enever, and Hannah Bennett on a girl's surf trip to discover that Fiji is indeed, full of surprises!
